This is the shrine or the supposed area of burial of St. James the great. This is the ultimate end to the pilgrimage - sort of like the endgame of the pilgrimage.

This is the area outside of the shrine, it has designs on them - many of great religious significance.

The Cathedral of San Salvador, it's a noteworthy location among the French way of the pilgrimage.

This is a general picture of the city of Santiago de Compostela. It's a beautiful location with towering church spires and homes going down a hill. It's the beginning of the end of the pilgrimage.

Camino de Santiago de Compostela, Spain.

The Scallop shell is a symbol of the Camino that you may find during the journey, it's very interesting.

Why did you choose this one?

I chose this specific one because it appeals to me, the very idea of me getting to leave my modern life and just have a simple existence is far more appealing to me than anything else that the modern life has to offer. As I'm not religious I don't find comfort in Religion, as I'm not at peace when at home I can't find comfort in my home, nor can I find it in anyone else in my life except myself - It speaks to the side of me that seeks simplicity instead of the me that focuses on depth and complexity.

What is your favourite feature and why?

My favourite feature is the lack of features. I genuinely just want to live simply and nothing else. A calm silence is what I seek but can't ever find, even home is loud and hectic.

Why would people visit here? What would they gain from it?

Well, there isn't much to be gained aside from breathing time. A break from hectic and busy modern life and a step back into calmness. In the modern day, we're hateful and quick to anger but simply - just living life at the bare minimum, is a more pleasurable existence then chasing a bar that you will never meet. A break from social standards and from living in a large community. You get to be you, just for that long walk but that one long walk would probably be more than enough.
